UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

No. 489—September Term, 1964.

(Argued June 8, 1965 Decided October 29, 1965.)

Docket No. 29521

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Appellee,

—v.—

CARL A. PICCIOLI,

Appellant.

Before:

WATERMAN, FRIENDLY and SMITH,

Circuit Judges.

Appeal from a judgment of the District Court for Connecticut, William H. Timbers, Chief Judge, convicting appellant, after a verdict, on a two-count indictment charging violation of 26 U. S. C. §7302 by wilful failure to pay the special gambling occupational tax, 26 U. S. C. §4411, and to register, 26 U. S. C. §4412. Affirmed.

PHILIP BAROFF, Bridgeport, Conn. (Charles Hanken on brief), for Appellant.

HOWARD T. OWENS, JR., Assistant United States Attorney (Jon O. Newman, United States Attorney, District of Connecticut), for Appellee.

FRIENDLY, Circuit Judge:

Piccioli was charged in a two-count indictment with violating 26 U. S. C. §7302 by wilful failure to pay the special gambling tax, 26 U. S. C. §4411, and to register, 26 U. S. C. §4412, and was convicted on both counts before Chief Judge Timbers and a jury. He was sentenced on the first count to imprisonment for one year and a fine of $5,000; on the second, imposition of sentence was suspended and probation fixed at two years.

Piccioli was one of the proprietors of the Pin-Up Bar in Bridgeport. Special Agent Ripa of the I. R. S., testified (on cross-examination) that "Artie" Gjanci, a defendant in United States v. Costello, —— F. 2d —— (2 Cir. 1965), instructed that, through arrangement between himself and Piccioli, Ripa could place bets with Piccioli, and that, when doing this by phone, he should say "This is Bill for Artie." Thereafter Ripa placed numerous horse race bets with Piccioli. There was evidence of furtiveness on Piccioli's part in accepting Ripa's wagers and paying his winnings. During the October 8 raid described in the Costello opinion, Special Agent Macolini obtained nearly $500 in cash and checks from Piccioli's pockets, along with three issues of a horse racing publication used by bookmakers. On that occasion in one hour a Connecticut State Trooper engaged in the search of the Pin-Up Bar received 23 calls from persons who were seeking to ascertain odds or, as the jury could properly infer, were about to place bets. Since this and other evidence warranted conviction, we turn to Piccioli's claims of error:

(1) Our Costello opinion details the publicity on October 8 and 9. When Piccioli was put to plea in New Haven on October 21, he requested that trial be had in Bridgeport, where the publicity had been most intense. On November 30 and December 1 four juries to try Piccioli's and other gambling cases were selected from the same venire, apparently with the understanding that the cases would be tried seriatim; the record shows no objection to that procedure and, when Piccioli's jury was being selected, the only venireman who recalled reading or hearing of his case was not chosen. His trial was adjourned until after that of Costello, Marchetti and Gjanci, which was widely publicized in the Bridgeport press. Piccioli's name figured in this, he being the "Carl" referred to in our opinion in that case; the papers reported he had been subpoenaed by the Government and had been excused at his lawyer's request. When Piccioli's case was called for trial on December 15, his counsel sought a new jury or a continuance because of the publicity given the Costello trial and Piccioli's involvement in it. The judge denied this but said he would inquire of the jurors, which he did without objection from counsel. When asked whether they had read or heard anything about the case or about Piccioli, there was no response.

In this aspect Piccioli's case is not significantly different from that of Costello, Marchetti and Gjanci. No objection on the score of the publicity on October 8 and 9 was made before the adverse verdict. The only issue relating to publicity which was brought to the judge's attention prior to trial was the newspaper accounts of the trial of Costello, Marchetti and Gjanci. A correct report of the trial and conviction of other persons for the same type of offense would not in and of itself be prejudicial, even when, as here, one of them figured in the evidence at the later trial; and there is no reason to suppose the jurors would read into the request that Piccioli be excused a claim of the privilege against self-incrimination. Moreover, we see no reason why the judge had to disbelieve the jurors' responses that the reports had not come to their attention.

(2) Another point has more merit but, in our view, not enough to demand reversal. Special Agent Macolini testified that after completing his search at the Pin-Up Bar, he told Piccioli and the latter's attorney, Mr. Hanken, who had entered the kitchen area in pursuit of a cup of coffee shortly after the raid, that he would like to ask "a few personal history questions"; that the attorney said he had instructed Piccioli not to answer questions; that Macolini then submitted his question sheet to Mr. Hanken; and that the attorney allowed Piccioli "to answer those personal history questions that were on the sheet." No objection was made to this, and the subject was not revived by counsel in cross, redirect, or recross examination. At the conclusion of Macolini's testimony, the judge reverted to this episode and, over objection by defense counsel, elicited an affirmative answer from Macolini to a question, "But the defendant was instructed in your presence by Mr. Hanken not to answer any questions with respect to whether or not he was accepting horse wagers on the premises." After listening to argument, the judge said, "I simply wanted to get it clear in my mind, and I assume the jury did also, as to precisely what happened," and then instructed "that, once the defendant was placed under arrest, it was his privilege under the Constitution not to answer any questions that might tend to incriminate him under Federal law . . . What brought the question on my part was, I was not quite sure what was meant by personal history questions, as distinguished from whatever questions he declined to answer." In submitting the case to the jury, the judge recounted Macolini's testimony and added that Mr. Hanken had a right to advise Piccioli not to answer questions and that Piccioli had a constitutional right not to do so.

Inquiry designed to establish that a defendant claimed the privilege against self-incrimination before a grand jury or a legislative committee or failed to testify at a former trial has been held in several cases to constitute reversible error. See Grunewald v. United States, 353 U. S. 391, 415-24 (1957); Stewart v. United States, 366 U. S. 1 (1961); United States v. Gross, 276 F. 2d 816 (2 Cir. 1960). If the privilege attaches at the moment of arrest, as the judge assumed, inquiry to show its assertion at that time would seem equally banned.[1] And we would reach the same conclusion although that assumption is wrong and the right of an arrested person not to respond rests simply on the lack of any power in the police to compel testimony—a hotly controverted issue[2] which we need not here decide. Silence under such circumstances, at least when, as in this case, it results from the advice of an attorney, affords no fair ground for relevant inference, see Kelly v. United States, 236 F. 2d 746, 749 (D. C. Cir. 1956); yet a jury would be likely to give it not inconsiderable weight. As said by Mr. Justice Harlan in Grunewald, supra, 353 U. S. at 424, with respect to a claim of privilege before a grand jury, "the dangers of impermissible use of this evidence far outweighed whatever advantage the Government might have derived from it if properly used." Cf. McCarthy v. United States, 25 F. 2d 298 (6 Cir. 1928); United States v. Pearson, 344 F. 2d 430 (6 Cir. 1965).

1 Presumably this is what is meant by the statement in Fagundes v. United States, 340 F. 2d 673, 677 (1 Cir. 1965), characterizing the right to remain silent on arrest as "akin to the right to decline to take the witness stand in one's own defense." See also Helton v. United States, 221 F. 2d 338, 340-42 (5 Cir. 1955); but see Kelly v. United States, 236 F. 2d 746, 750-51 n. 10 (D. C. Cir. 1956).

2 See 8 Wigmore, Evidence §2252, at 328-29 & n. 27 (McNaughton rev. 1960); Morgan, The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, 34 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 27-30 (1949); Note, The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination: Does It Exist in the Police Station?, 5 Stan. L. Rev. 457 (1953); 1 Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 146-48 (1961); Maguire, Evidence of Guilt §2.03, at 15-16 (1959).

The judge's question, for which the cold record affords no apparent reason, was thus ill-advised, to say the least. Nor was it cured, as the Government urges, by his subsequent instruction that the lawyer and Piccioli had been acting within their rights; the proper caution would have been that the evidence was to be disregarded and no inference drawn therefrom. But we cannot see that the question and answer added anything so significant to what Macolini had testified on his direct examination without objection as to afford sufficient basis for reversal, 28 U. S. C. §2111, F. R. Cr. P. 52(a).

(3) The final point requiring discussion is the contention that the judge took impermissible considerations into account in passing sentence.

Piccioli was sentenced on January 11, 1965, along with defendants in other gambling tax cases. In explaining the sentences in the Costello, Marchetti and Gjanci cases, Chief Judge Timbers made certain remarks which we set forth in part in the margin.[3] He followed these by recommending

3 "The Court regards these charges as serious. It is faced with the duty of imposing sentence following a finding of guilty by a jury.

"While it is true that these are tax cases, prosecutions authorized by the revenue laws of the United States, it is also a fact, with respect to which the Court is not blind, that it is the clear intent of Congress, in authorizing such prosecutions, to deal with a vice, namely that of gambling.

"While it is perfectly true, and no one knows better than the Court, that the charge against these defendants was not that of gambling, it is equally true that the prosecutions never would have been brought and there never would have been convictions but for extensive gambling and accepting of wagers as demonstrated by the evidence.

"As this Court has observed before, one of the handmaidens of vice in any community—here graphically demonstrated in the Bridgeport community—one of the handmaidens of vice is that of gambling. The other two, with which this Court has dealt severely and will continue to deal severely, are those of narcotics and prostitution. Of course it is that the United States Attorney forward a transcript of them and of the evidence to Connecticut prosecutors. Later, on February 8, before taking up the criminal calendar in New Haven, Chief Judge Timbers made a further statement about the gambling tax cases with which he had been concerned. In this statement, some nine printed pages long, he praised the work of the United States Attorney and his staff, of the Intelligence Division of the Internal Revenue Service, and of the Connecticut State Police; deprecated the absence of cooperation by the local Bridgeport police and "the apparent lack of willingness or ability on the part of certain of the prosecutors (in one instance under the pretense of 'public apathy,' which is pure, unadulterated bunk) and judges of the state circuit court to back up the local and state police in enforcing the gambling laws of this state"; and noted "the ground swell of public support throughout the state for what has been accomplished by this latest federal crackdown upon gambling and organized crime." After announcing his intention to impose stiff sentences for violation of the federal gambling tax and related laws, he ended by proposing that a Connecticut Conference on Law Enforcement be convened, and outlined a detailed program for its membership and activities.

The circumstances under which an appellate court will interfere with a sentence within the permissible maximum because of the judge's reliance on allegedly irrelevant cri-

well known that the revenue from gambling is the financial basis or keystone upon which much of crime is built.

"The Court does not intend, in imposing sentence here, to deal out the slap on the wrist which has characterized sentences imposed by the State Courts for violations of the State gambling laws. The Court intends, by the sentences here to be imposed, to serve a stern warning, once again, as the Court has repeatedly in the past, that the United States is not powerless to deal effectively with violations of the Federal revenue laws and particularly the law here involved. It will do so, if need be, alone."

teria, see United States v. Wiley, 267 F. 2d 453 (7 Cir. 1959), are and, so long as such sentences are generally unreviewable, ought be rare. It would be wholly appropriate for the judge to look beyond Piccioli's failure to register and buy a $50 tax stamp and to consider the attendant substantial losses of revenue through his failure to pay the percentage tax on wagers, of which the judge had heard abundant evidence, even though that crime had not been charged. Cf. United States v. Doyle, —— F. 2d ——, —— (2 Cir. 1965). Piccioli's argument is thus reduced to the claim that the judge was enforcing not simply the federal laws which were his proper concern but state laws which were not. The record does suggest that the judge's indignation at what he had learned at the trials and from presentence reports may have led to statements in the prosecutorial area beyond his function. On the other hand, since he could have taken into account a record of state crimes and charges unrelated to the federal offense proved, it would be strange if he could not consider that the evidence showed a violation of state gambling laws and the effect of gambling on other state crime. Cf. United States v. Doyle, supra.

Piccioli's other points either are dealt with in United States v. Costello or lack sufficient merit for discussion.

Affirmed.

Appeals from judgments of the District Court for Connecticut, William H. Timbers, Chief Judge, convicting appellants, after a verdict, of offenses under the federal wagering tax laws. Affirmed.

PHILIP R. SHIFF, New Haven, Conn. (Adrian W. Maher, on brief), for Appellant Frank Costello.

JACOB D. ZELDES, Bridgeport, Conn. (Francis J. King, David Goldstein, Joseph S. Catalano, on brief), for Appellant Marchetti.

FRIENDLY, Circuit Judge:

These three appeals, along with United States v. Piccioli, —— F. 2d ——, and United States v. Markis, —— F. 2d ——, this day decided, stem from a raid carried out by Internal Revenue Service agents and state police in Bridgeport, Connecticut, on October 8, 1964. Appellants Frank Costello, James "Totto" Marchetti and Arthur Gjanci were tried together and convicted on all counts before Chief Judge Timbers and a jury under four indictments. Three two-count indictments similar in form charged each of them with violations of 26 U. S. C. §7203 in that, being engaged in the business of accepting wagers or receiving them for one so engaged, they wilfully failed (1) to purchase the occupational wagering tax stamp required by 26 U. S. C. §4411 and (2) to register as required by §4412. The fourth indictment charged all three with conspiring to fail to purchase the occupational tax stamps. Costello and Marchetti received concurrent one-year prison sentences and $10,000 fines in the conspiracy case and under Count 1 of their individual indictments; the imposition of sentence was suspended and probation for two years was imposed under Count 2. Gjanci's sentences differed in that the fine was $2,500.

Certain points are common to the three appeals and, to some extent, to the two others mentioned. After outlining the facts of this case, we shall deal first with these common points and then consider arguments peculiar to various appellants.

In the summer of 1964 Special Agent John Ripa of the I. R. S. was detailed to work in Bridgeport as an undercover agent, posing as a person wishing to make numbers and horse bets and later as a would-be bookmaker. He placed numerous bets with Gjanci and Marchetti at the Lafayette Diner or, in some instances with respect to Gjanci, at the Greek Coffee House. On October 2, he placed bets with Costello, paying with two marked $20 bills which were found in Costello's pocket on the latter's arrest. Earlier, on September 3, he had asked Gjanci if he could set up an arrangement to turn in bets and receive a commission. Gjanci said he would speak to Marchetti to arrange this, and also that he would talk to his "bosses—Totto and Frank" about letting Ripa place bets at a local variety store; Gjanci referred to Costello as the "big boss of Bridgeport." On September 9, Marchetti arranged for Ripa to "book on 50%" with "Tony," with settlement to be made with Marchetti. On several later instances Costello made inquiries and gave directions whence the jury could infer that he was indeed "a boss"—if not indeed "the boss," in the enterprise. At trial Costello denied any involvement in the wagering business; Marchetti admitted accepting some bets from Ripa but denied others and also denied Costello's involvement; Gjanci did not testify.

I.

Appellants' most basic point concerns the constitutionality of the federal wagering tax. Recognizing that these provisions were sustained in United States v. Kahriger, 345 U. S. 22 (1953), appellants say their situation differs in two respects. One is that statements of the prosecutor and the judge demonstrated that the purpose of the Government's applying the statute against them was not to collect revenue, concededly the only available source of federal power, but to promote the enforcement of state laws against gambling; the other is that the enlargement of the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment to include federal compulsion of the admission of crime against the states, see Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U. S. 52, 53 n. 1, 77-78 (1964), overruling United States v. Murdock, 284 U. S. 141 (1931), and recent emphasis that the clause embraces all statements save those that "cannot possibly" tend to incriminate, see Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1, 12 (1964), place the Kahriger holding on self-incrimination in question.[1]

With respect to the first contention, apart from questions as to what effect on constitutionality statements by prosecutors and judges can have, nothing in the present record goes materially beyond what the Supreme Court characterized in Kahriger as "suggestions in the debates that Congress sought to hinder, if not prevent, the type of gambling taxed." 345 U. S. at 27 n. 3. If "the verbal cellophane of a revenue measure," 345 U. S. at 38 (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter), was sufficiently opaque for a majority of the Supreme Court twelve years ago, it remains so for us now. Whether the judge impermissibly allowed considerations unrelated to the nonpayment of the tax to enter into sentence, a claim raised only

1 Marchetti makes an additional argument based on the 1958 amendment, 72 Stat. 1304, which added to §4401(c) a provision that any person required to register under §4412 who receives wagers for or on behalf of another without having registered the name and residence of the latter as §4412(a)(3) requires, shall himself be liable for the tax on wagers to the extent of his receipts. He contends that since §4412 requires registration by persons required to pay the special tax by §4411 and §4411 requires such payment from anyone who is liable for the percentage tax under §4401 or is engaged in receiving wagers for or on behalf of a person so liable, a cross-reference to §4412 in §4401 necessarily renders the statute circular and unintelligible. We see no force in this argument. The 1958 amendment did not affect who was required to pay the special tax and to register, see 3 U. S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4457 (1958); it simply made persons who failed to comply with the special requirement of §4412(a)(3) liable for the tax on wagers imposed by §4401, when they would not previously have been.

by Piccioli, is a different problem which we will discuss in the opinion in his case.

The contention with respect to the self-incrimination clause would be more serious if United States v. Kahriger stood alone, since whatever the stated basis for decision, the result followed so logically from the now-overruled Murdock doctrine. However, the Court again considered the Fifth Amendment objection in Lewis v. United States, 348 U. S. 419 (1955), which arose in the District of Columbia where wagering was a crime by federal law. The Court disposed of the argument on the basis that "If petitioner desires to engage in an unlawful business, he does so only on his own volition. The fact that he may elect to pay the tax and make the prescribed disclosures required by the Act is a matter of his choice. There is nothing compulsory about it, and, consequently, there is nothing violative of the Fifth Amendment." 348 U. S. at 422. If Congress can constitutionally require, as a condition to gambling, a registration that would show an intention to engage in a business prohibited by a federal law, we can think of no reason why it should not have the same power to require registration that would give notice of an intention to engage in activity made illegal by the laws of a state; and the probability of incrimination for future or even past acts, however great, is irrelevant on the Court's stated theory that the registration cannot be called compulsory. It is true that both Kahriger and Lewis were decided over vigorous dissents by Justices Black and Douglas on the Fifth Amendment point. But we find no subsequent opinion reflecting on the authority or reasoning of these cases and, at least under such circumstances, it is no proper function of ours to speculate on whether the dissent of yesterday may become the decision of tomorrow. Cf. United States v. Zizzo, 338 F. 2d 577, 580-81 (7 Cir. 1964), cert. denied, —— U. S. —— (1965); United States v. Cefalu, 338 F. 2d 582 (7 Cir. 1964). We are therefore not required to consider other arguments on which the Government might rely, such as the lack of any claim of the privilege at an earlier stage, see United States v. Sullivan, 274 U. S. 259, 263-64 (1927); United States v. Kahriger, supra, 345 U. S. at 32, and the required records doctrine, see Shapiro v. United States, 335 U. S. 1 (1948); Meltzer, Required Records, the McCarran Act and the Privilege against Self-Incrimination, 18 U. Chi. L. Rev. 687 (1951).

II.

Appellants contend their trial was rendered unfair by publicity, much of it emanating from the Government.

The indictments against appellants and others were returned in New Haven on October 6, 1964; bail was fixed but the indictments remained impounded, F. R. Cr. P. 6(e), until October 8 at 2:36 P.M. A press release distributed earlier by the Government to newsmen announced in part that at 1:20 P.M.: "In a spectacular thrust at the extensive gambling activities in this area, 75 special agents of the Intelligence Division, with the aid of 50 State Policemen, swooped down on some 40 establishments, arresting approximately 45 persons engaged in such gambling activities as policy numbers and betting on horse races and other sports events, in violation of the Federal wagering tax laws. . . . The special agents were successful in breaking up a large, syndicated operation including some of the most important higher-ups in the gambling syndicate." The release mentioned no names except for saying that appellants were charged with conspiracy, as well as with the two substantive counts employed against most other defendants, and that Costello, Marchetti and a third man had bail fixed at $10,000, $5,000 and $5,000, respectively, while the figure for the other defendants was $2,500. The Government took the newsmen to the I. R. S. headquarters where the latter were able to photograph those who had been arrested as they were brought into custody. There was extensive newspaper, radio and television coverage on October 8 in Bridgeport and elsewhere in Connecticut. On the two following days, the Bridgeport press reported oral statements by Chief Assistant United States Attorney Owens to the effect that the Government had "broken the back of gambling" in Bridgeport, that funds from gambling were supporting prostitution, that housewives had called to express gratitude at the prospective curtailment of their husbands' aleatory propensities, and that Costello and Marchetti had previous convictions for income tax violation.

The last statement was improper by any standard and might well be a basis for reversal if appellants had moved for a change of venue or a continuance and this had been denied, and examination of the jurors had revealed recollection of these charges. Marshall v. United States, 360 U. S. 310 (1959); United States ex rel. Brown v. Smith, 306 F. 2d 596, 603 (2 Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 372 U. S. 959 (1963); see Beck v. Washington, 369 U. S. 541, 555-58 (1962). But appellants did not meet these essential conditions. Being put to plea in New Haven, trial counsel for Costello and Gjanci sought trial in Bridgeport where the publicity had peaked, Marchetti did not object, and no motion for a continuance was made. When the judge examined prospective jurors on November 30, only three of the panel said they had read or heard about the cases, and none of them were chosen. The attack because of the publicity here described came only in a motion in arrest of judgment after the verdict. This was too late; counsel could not speculate on a favorable verdict and then claim lack of "an impartial jury" when the gamble failed.

Although another episode as to publicity was properly raised, the objection fails on the merits. On December 3, the first day of actual trial, defense counsel, out of the jury's presence, moved for a mistrial because of an article in the Bridgeport Post of December 1 which reported that "six more suspected gamblers arrested by federal agents last October today submitted guilty pleas" and that Owens said he expected others to change their pleas to guilty. At the request of the United States Attorney and with the consent of defense counsel, the court asked the jury, most of whom came from the New Haven area, whether any of them had read anything about the case or related cases since their selection as jurors. None responded, and the motion was denied. Appellants say the jurors' silence did not necessarily reflect the truth since the jurors would not be likely to admit they had violated the judge's previous instructions not to read about the gambling prosecutions. Whatever the force of such a contention might or might not be where publicity subsequent to the selection of the jury could be seriously prejudicial, cf. United States v. Agueci, 310 F. 2d 817, 831-33 (2 Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 372 U. S. 959 (1963), and cases there discussed, the December 1 article contained nothing that could deprive appellants of a fair trial. If one of appellants had pleaded guilty during the trial, the jury could have been so informed under proper caution. United States v. Crosby, 294 F. 2d 928, 948 (2 Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 368 U. S. 984 (1962); United States v. Dardi, 330 F. 2d 316, 332-33 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 845 (1964). In the light of that principle it is impossible to see what prejudice could result from a prediction that other defendants, with no relation to appellants save having been seized in the raids of October 8, might change their not-guilty pleas.

III.

Ripa's testimony was received over a chorus of objections on the score of the hearsay rule. Whenever he testified as to a transaction or communication with one of the appellants, the others would object to its reception against them as hearsay; when he testified as to transactions or communications with other persons at the instance of one or more of the appellants, all three would object on that ground to its admission against any who were not present.

The objections betray a clear although common misconception of the nature of the hearsay rule. Only in a few instances was Ripa's testimony of declarations from which the jury was to accept the truth of the matter asserted, such as Gjanci's statement that Marchetti and Costello were his bosses. The basis for an objection in other cases, e.g., by Gjanci to testimony that Ripa had placed bets with Marchetti or with "Tony," is not at all that this is hearsay; the testimony of Ripa—himself on the stand subject to cross-examination—chiefly described acts, and no out-of-court utterance of Ripa, Marchetti or "Tony" was being offered to prove the truth of anything asserted in such utterance, 6 Wigmore, Evidence §1766 (3d ed. 1940); Aikins v. United States, 282 F. 2d 53, 57 (10 Cir. 1960); United States v. Annunziato, 293 F. 2d 373, 376-77 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 368 U. S. 919 (1961). The proper objection is that, without more, Ripa's story as to a transaction with one person would not be relevant to prove the crime charged against another.

As the Supreme Court made clear in Lutwak v. United States, 344 U. S. 604, 617-19 (1953), there is a distinction between acts and declarations with respect to admissibility. Out-of-court declarations of an alleged conspirator introduced to prove the truth of the matter asserted meet the obstacle of the hearsay rule; while always receivable against the declarant as an admission, they can be used against others, unless some other exception applies, only on independent proof of agency, see 4 Wigmore, supra, §1079, and the agency does not go beyond statements in furtherance of the conspiracy.[2] Evidence of an act (or a statement offered other than for its truth) has no special evidentiary hurdle to overcome and, whether the act is by a co-conspirator or third person and whether it occurs during the period of a conspiracy or not, the evidence is admissible so long as the act is probative of a crime charged against a defendant and the evidence is not excludable on some special ground.[3] Thus, the acts of others not involving the defendant directly may come in against him merely to show the existence of a conspiracy, with which he is to

2 Since by hypothesis the conspiracy and defendant's participation must be independently established before the hearsay may be used against him, one may wonder at first blush what role remains for the declaration. Making this point, Judge L. Hand in United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 230-31 (2 Cir. 1950) (dictum), aff'd, 341 U. S. 494 (1951), suggested that the conspiracy and participation questions be independently decided by the trial judge and the hearsay then given to the jury without limitation. But even if the judge, as in the Dennis trial and in the present case, charges that the jury must itself resolve this "preliminary" question beyond a reasonable doubt, the hearsay may still be useful to the prosecution, for example to characterize the conspiracy as to purpose or date, or as evidence that defendant engaged in another crime for which he is on trial. See generally McCormick, Evidence §245, at 522 n. 33 (1954).

3 Paralleling the hearsay exception in evidence law—indeed, its very foundation in Wigmore's view, 4 Wigmore, supra, §1079, at 127-31—is the debated contention that a defendant will be liable for the substantive crime of another upon independent proof that the actor was furthering a conspiracy in which defendant was a member. See Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 Harv. L. Rev. 920, 993-1000 (1959). No such instruction was given in this case.

be linked by quite separate proof. An act of any other conspirator during the alleged conspiracy and in furtherance of it almost inevitably meets this test, and, as held in Lutwak, acts by such others even before or after the period of the conspiracy may still be relevant in suggesting its existence and its aims. See United States v. Ross, 321 F. 2d 61, 68-69 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U. S. 894 (1963).[4]

Subject to a general point made by Costello which we will mention below, this discussion suffices to dispose of the objections of Marchetti and Costello to the admission of Ripa's testimony as to the placing of bets with Gjanci between July 23 and 31, on the ground that the court had ruled only that a sufficient showing of conspiracy had been made for the period beginning August 12.[5] Even more clearly it disposes of the objection of each appellant to testimony as to conversations and transactions between Ripa and other appellants and non-parties after August 12. Ripa's testimony that Marchetti had called "Tony" and 4 The briefs exhibit a common confusion in contending that evidence meeting the standard we have indicated would be admissible only under the conspiracy count; such evidence is admissible on substantive counts even when there is no conspiracy indictment at all. United States v. Pugliese, 153 F. 2d 497, 500 (2 Cir. 1945); United States v. Annunziato, supra, 293 F. 2d at 378; United States v. Smith, 343 F. 2d 847 (6 Cir. 1965).

5 We note also that although at the time of the admission of this evidence the court may have been satisfied only as to a conspiracy beginning August 12, other competent evidence later introduced warranted a finding that the conspiracy had existed from July 23 and, indeed, long before. Cf. United States v. Dennis, supra, 183 F. 2d at 231. The comments in the text and in this footnote apply also to the objection that the court allowed testimony as to acts subsequent to October 2, the last date to which the judge, in his initial ruling, had found the conspiracy extended. And there is nothing to Costello's special objection to the admission of evidence relating to acts on October 7, the day after the indictment had been found; the impounded indictment did not end the conspiracy, as the evidence obtained in the October 8 raids demonstrated.

arranged for Ripa to book with "Tony," with Ripa to settle up with him once a week, was plainly admissible against Marchetti and also against the other appellants so far as it might prove Marchetti engaged in a gambling conspiracy to which they might independently be linked. Gjanci's instructions that Ripa should bet with "Carl" and settle with him were admissible on the same basis. Once evidence of these instructions by Marchetti and Gjanci was admitted against appellants, Ripa's testimony that he had then placed bets with Tony and Carl was highly relevant; evidence that the names or telephone numbers led to a gambling enterprise tended to show that the man furnishing the information—and his independently linked co-conspirators—were part of that enterprise. Ripa, in the course of describing his transactions with the appellants and Tony and Carl, naturally told the jury what he himself said or did during the encounters, but this was not to charge his own behavior or statements to the conspirators but simply to provide the necessary context for understanding their conduct which he was relating. United States v. Morello, 250 F. 2d 631, 634 (2 Cir. 1957), relied on by appellants, simply held that an out-of-court declaration by an undercover agent acting as a conspirator could not be received against co-conspirators as their admission under the conspiracy exception to the hearsay rule. But as Morello itself indicated, the act of a co-conspirator was admissible for whatever it was worth against the defendants, although occurring outside their presence and without their knowledge, so long as their participation in the conspiracy was proved by independent evidence; and the undercover agent's description of his own conduct, apart from the use of his out-of-court statements for their truth, received no censure. 250 F. 2d at 634-35.

Costello argues there was no sufficient independent evidence to connect him with the conspiracy, stressing that Ripa did not meet him until September 14. However, Ripa's testimony as to what Costello said and did on that occasion and later amply justified a finding that Costello was one of the "bosses" and had been so from the outset. With the declarations of Gjanci as to Costello's role thus made competent, the contention that the Government failed to adduce sufficient evidence to warrant submission of Costello's case to the jury falls by the wayside.

A final objection relates to oral and written post-arrest statements by Marchetti, discussed in another context below. These were offered and received only against him. In his charge the judge said that the oral statements were received only against Marchetti, but that the written statement was received against all defendants in the conspiracy case although not in the substantive cases other than Marchetti's. No exception to the erroneous instruction was taken. It is plain that if one had been, the judge would have corrected his mistake. For reasons fully explained in United States v. Kahaner, 317 F. 2d 459, 478-79 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U. S. 836 (1963), we decline to notice the point.

IV.

As just indicated, Marchetti was interrogated after arrest by a Special Agent, who recorded his oral answers on a question sheet which Marchetti then signed. Apparently Marchetti was first warned of his right not to answer any questions but not of any right to confer with counsel. The agent's testimony and the question sheet were received in evidence against Marchetti without objection. After warning of his right not to answer questions that would incriminate him under federal law, another agent asked Gjanci if he had a federal tax stamp and, this being answered in the negative, why not; Gjanci replied that he didn't accept wagers but "just play[ed] the numbers." No objection to this testimony was made.

Marchetti and Gjanci now urge that reception of this evidence violated their rights under the Assistance of Counsel clause of the Sixth Amendment as interpreted in Massiah v. United States, 377 U. S. 201 (1964), and Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964), and under F. R. Cr. P. 5(a) as implemented by McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332 (1943), and Mallory v. United States, 354 U. S. 449 (1957). The Government contends, inter alia, that Gjanci's statement was exculpatory (save as to his stipulated failure to have a tax stamp) and that Marchetti's failure to object was deliberate, since, there being overwhelming proof against him, his sole objective was to protect Costello, as the statement did. We find it unnecessary to examine these contentions. We held some years ago that we need not consider McNabb-Mallory objections not clearly made at trial, United States v. Ladson, 294 F. 2d 535, 538-39 (2 Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 369 U. S. 824 (1962). In the course of its in banc consideration of a number of cases involving Massiah and Escobedo claims arising out of trials after those decisions, the court has reached the same general conclusion, United States v. Indiviglio, —— F. 2d —— (1965), and we find no special circumstances warranting different action here.

We have carefully examined appellants' other claims of error but do not consider them to require discussion. The Court is indebted to Carroll W. Brewster and Kimberly B. Cheney, assigned counsel, for their presentation on Gjanci's behalf.

Opinion of Court of Appeals in U. S. v. Grassia

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

No. 105—September Term, 1965.

(Argued October 28, 1965 Decided November 26, 1965.)

Docket No. 29791

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Appellee,

—v.—

ALFRED GRASSIA,

Appellant.

Before:

LUMBARD, Chief Judge,
FRIENDLY and SMITH, Circuit Judges.

Defendant, having been charged in a two-count indictment, in the District Court for Connecticut, with willful failure to pay the special occupational tax relating to wagers imposed by 26 U. S. C. §4411, in violation of 26 U. S. C. §7203, changed his plea of not guilty to one of nolo contendere on one count, and appeals from the resulting conviction by Judge Clarie. Affirmed.

JACOB D. ZELDES (David Goldstein, Bridgeport, Conn., on brief), for Appellant.

JON O. NEWMAN, United States Attorney for the District of Connecticut, for Appellee.

FRIENDLY, Circuit Judge:

This is another appeal stemming from the raids relating to enforcement of the federal wagering tax at Bridgeport, Connecticut, on October 8, 1964. See United States v. Costello, —— F. 2d —— (2 Cir. 1965), United States v. Piccioli, —— F. 2d —— (2 Cir. 1965), and United States v. Markis, —— F. 2d —— (2 Cir. 1965). Alfred Grassia, represented by counsel and duly questioned by Judge Clarie at a term of the District Court for Connecticut at Hartford, to which, at his request, his case had been transferred for trial on his not guilty plea, pleaded nolo contendere to one count of a two-count indictment charging, under 26 U. S. C. §7203, willful failure to pay the special occupational tax relating to wagers imposed by 26 U. S. C. §4411. The other count was then dismissed at the Government's request. His points on appeal from the resulting conviction fall into two categories. The first repeats the same constitutional attacks on the federal wagering tax statutes that were advanced in the earlier cases. His other point is that the conscious generation of publicity by the Government and statements by Chief Judge Timbers in the course of other proceedings in January and February, 1965, prior to Grassia's change of plea,[1] see United States v. Costello, supra, —— F. 2d at ——, slip opinion at 3325-26; United States v. Piccioli, supra, —— F. 2d ——, slip opinion at 3340-41, so prejudiced his opportunity for a fair trial that the indictment should have been dismissed.

The first group of contentions, challenging the constitutionality of the federal wagering tax statutes, survive the plea of nolo contendere, as the Government concedes. But, so far as this Court is concerned, they have been determined adversely to Grassia by United States v. Costello, supra, —— F. 2d ——, slip opinion, 3322-25. Recognizing that the rationale of Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board, —— U. S. —— (1965), announced subsequent to our Costello opinion, may lead the Supreme Court to overrule its previous decisions in United States v. Kahriger, 345 U. S. 22 (1953), and Lewis v. United States, 348 U. S. 419 (1955), insofar as these sustained the federal wagering statutes against attack on the ground of self-incrimination, we consider that issue more appropriate for that Court's determination.

1 The judge's statements were the basis of one of several motions by Grassia to dismiss the indictment or for a continuance.

As to Grassia's other contention, that his right to a fair trial was compromised by adverse publicity, the United States concedes that, at the time of the change of plea and the dismissal of the second count, counsel made clear to the prosecutor and the court that Grassia intended to press the point on appeal, contrast United States v. Doyle, 348 F. 2d 715, 720 (2 Cir. 1965); but it urges that a claim of the impossibility of obtaining an impartial trial is necessarily foreclosed when the defendant, freely and with the assistance of counsel, decides not to have one. Grassia responds that a defendant cannot be required to undergo a trial which the prosecution or the court has forced to occur at a place or a time that is inconsistent with the guarantees of the Sixth Amendment. His point is that the Amendment guarantees not only trial by an impartial jury but a "speedy" trial in the district where "the crime shall have been committed." He says that when this has been made impossible by the Government, as distinguished from third parties, the conventional remedies of extended continuance or change of venue are inappropriate since these involve a sacrifice of Sixth Amendment rights, and the only suitable remedy is dismissal of the indictment, thus rendering inconsequential any plea of nolo contendere and waiver of trial.

We do not find it necessary to consider whether a case might conceivably arise where the Government's conduct in generating publicity had been so egregious and the prejudice engendered by it so pervasive, cf. Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U. S. 717 (1961), that the drastic sanction of dismissal of the indictment would be demanded, in the interest of the particular defendant or for general therapeutic purposes, or for both. It suffices for decision here that the hurdle confronting any such claim must be exceedingly high and that Grassia does not come close to meeting it. Although we disapprove of what seems to have been needless intensification by the Government of the news of the arrests and, still more, of the unnecessary statements by the Chief Assistant United States Attorney on the two following days, see United States v. Costello, supra, —— F. 2d at ——, slip opinion, 3326, it proved possible to obtain impartial juries even at Bridgeport where the publicity was at its peak, see United States v. Piccioli, supra, —— F. 2d at ——, slip opinion, 3336-37; United States v. Markis, supra, —— F. 2d at ——, slip opinion, 3344. Criminal defendants are understandably prone to exaggerate the interest their fellow citizens take in matters of such acute concern to them. The transfer of Grassia's trial to Hartford, also within the "district," on December 4 on his request, although doubtless prudent, thus did not result from any demonstrated impossibility of obtaining a speedy trial by an impartial jury in Bridgeport.[2] And although the fact that defendants arrested in the October raid were still awaiting trial rendered Chief Judge Timbers' statement of February 8, 1965, even more ill-advised than we indicated in United States v. Piccioli, supra, ——F. 2d at ——, slip opinion, 3342, we are wholly unconvinced that this pronouncement, combined with the preceding publicity generated by the prosecutor and the judge, made it so plainly impossible to obtain an impartial jury in Hartford as to relieve Grassia of any need to develop the facts by adhering to his plea of not guilty and examining the venire at Hartford on a voir dire.
